This morning we left our friends, Dixie and Mike, and headed south. We had never been to a bed and breakfast before. The way it works is, you give your hosts money and they are your friends.

Mike recited poetry while we ate. Our favorite was “Cowboy Colonoscopy”.

At Dixie’s recommendation we hiked the Mossy Cave trail. The cave was a snoozer. We jumped a creek and climbed up to some rock windows. It was steep and gravelly. When we got to the top, the windows were really cool and the hikers below were ants. I set the camera on a big root, the only place it wouldn’t slide all the way down into the creek, and set the timer. Amazing.

Boy did the day get good. UDOT made sure we didn’t miss any of the scenery on Route 89.

Before we got to Kanab, our next destination, we stopped at Moqui Cave. Actually, Hoqui Cave. No stalactites here, just cheesy displays and a gift shop. In one room, there were petroglyphs in fluorescent paint, under blacklight.

Then the day got even better – we did the wash.
