Today we are in Kanab, Utah, home of the world famous geological marvel: Balanced Rock.

And we are very close to another geological wonder, the Coral Pink Sand Dunes. So we went there.

The park comprises a visitor center, an observation deck and about 80 campsites. From the campsites are short access roads to the dunes, from which monster vehicles with massive tread blocks assault the sand. Moms and little barefoot children scatter and PTSD sufferers dive for cover. Hey, they rent 'em right there at the park as long as you're tall enough to see over the steering wheel and can find a crash helmet that fits.

We left the park and drove back toward Kanab a ways, looking for a private place to explore the dunes. We found a path in the sand next to the road and in between little groups of grazing cattle.

Other people have clearly had the same idea.

We trudged to the top and, sure enough, there were a bunch of dunes...

...with cow food growing out of them. But the cows like to stay at the bottoms of the dunes because, do you know how much a cow weighs? Do you know how deep they can sink? They really hate the sand.

Possible cow food.

We took only pictures.
We left only footprints.
We went back to Kanab.

PS – Sand is tan. Balanced Rock is coral pink.
